We Are Arrested: A Journalist's Notes from a Turkish Prison

The dank air hung thick with the scent of rancid bread and unwashed bodies. The metallic clang of a distant door echoed through the chilly corridors of Silivri Prison, a sound that had become the unwelcome soundtrack to my existence. This isn't a fabricated account; these are my notes, scribbled in the feeble light of a smuggled flashlight, documenting my wrongful imprisonment in Turkey. My crime? Reporting the facts, a crime seemingly increasingly prevalent in a world where the lines between news and misinformation blur.

My journey began, like many others, with an assignment. I was investigating allegations of corruption within the political system. My sources, courageous individuals risking their own safety, provided me with evidence that suggested to a vast network of control peddling in unlawful activities. I meticulously documented my findings, cross-referencing information, and verifying every detail with multiple independent sources. My goal was simple: to inform the public, to hold those in power answerable.

The arrest came unexpectedly, a swift raid on my apartment in the dead of night. Masked authorities burst in, their brutal demeanor leaving no room for debate. The charges were vague, a combination of country security concerns and offenses against the state. The court process, to put it mildly, was a sham. My requests for a lawyer were initially ignored, and my attempts to contact the outside world were blocked.

Life inside Silivri is a relentless struggle for dignity. The conditions are harsh, the food disgusting, and the psychological toll is immense. Sleep is a privilege, punctuated by the constant sounds of cries and the muffled echo of arguments and fights. The days blur into one another, a monotonous cycle of anticipation and doubt.

But amidst the despair, there's a enduring spirit. The companion prisoners, many of them political detainees, share stories of their own trials. Their experiences, though vastly different, are bound by a common thread: the pursuit of truth in a system that actively works against it. We support one another, sharing what little belief we have left.

The act of writing these notes has become a form of defiance. It is a way to retain my sanity, to document my experiences, and, I hope, to reveal the injustices I've witnessed. It's a testament to the enduring force of the human spirit, the unbending desire to voice the reality even in the face of overwhelming suppression.

My release, should it ever come, will be a victory not just for me but for all those who fight for freedom of expression. The quiet imposed upon us is meant to break us, but it only strengthens our resolve. This is not just a individual battle; it's a struggle for the fate of journalism, and the future of truth itself.
